Here he was assigned to a six weeks' course at the 3rd aero base before he would be sent to the front, and had been in training a month when the armistice was signed. Two weeks more would have seen him in active duty at the front, when the Germans threw up the sponge. There were hundreds of other American aviators in the same fix and naturally they were all disappointed at not having had a chance at the Boche, after going through such a long and arduous period of training. Lieut. Reeves was detained with the army of occupation for some time, before being returned home, and after arrival was kept at Mende for several weeks before being mustered out. He stopped a few days in the East on a visit, then coming to Tombstone to spend several weeks before leaving for Colorado, where he will again get back to pre-war vocation.
